WORKING PAPERS

“Retirement, Retention, Recruitment: Evidence from a Federal Pension Policy”

[\[Job Market Paper\]](#)

Under Review

I exploit a policy change for U.S. federal workers’ pension benefits to estimate the effect of pension generosity on worker retirement, retention and recruitment. The policy increased pensions by 16%-25% or approximately $111,000. There is a 30% decrease in job quits for permanent workers. However, there is little evidence that pension generosity has an effect on new hires. This suggests salience may play a role in how workers value pensions. Additionally, I find a large heterogeneous labor supply response to pension generosity. Altogether, this shows that pension generosity is effective in retaining workers and may have important implications for workforce planning.

WORKS IN PROGRESS

“Disability-Based Affirmative Action: How Federal Agencies Satisfied Federal Mandates”
(with Glen Waddell)

The U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission issued a ruling that required federal agencies to engage in disability-based affirmative action. Representation quotas were set separately for targeted and non-targeted disabilities, and for upper- and lower-level employees. With heterogeneity in the cost of accommodating different disabilities and a representation quota, up to and including a mandate to provide personal assistance services when needed, how agencies meet their quotas need not align with the spirit of the ruling. In this paper we document the pattern of hiring, retention, and separations across eight federal agencies, and show that hiring does not explain the increase in individuals with disability. Instead, there is evidence that individuals revealed their disability, specifically managers and individuals with hearing loss or vision loss.

“A Second Chance at Financial Inclusion: The Impact of Repayment Plans and Incentives on Delinquent Digital Borrowers” (with Alfredo Burlando, Silvia Prina, and Michael Kuhn)
